One of the objects of a Tariff upon Porto Rico's products imported here is to establish a right to impose such a Tariff in later years, should it be found necessary. This will be a precedent in our legislation for onew possessions, the Philippines. The proposed import duty—15% of the Dingley rates—is merely nominal, within 6% of Free-trade. What Forto Rico is today we know; what it may become ten or twenty years from now, under the influence of American capital and enterprise, we can only conjecture. Cotton may be grown there, and cotton manufacturing might become a large industry. With cheap island labor, the product of our own Northern and Southern mills, could thus be undersold. Would it be right to expose the agricultural and industrial interests of these United States to such competition? If the principle of a Tariff be not now maintained, it might be difficult, if not impossible, to impose one hereafter, if it should thus become hereafter, if it should thus become hereafter, if the project the interests of American citizens on the
